For Hillary Clinton, at last, a convention of her own

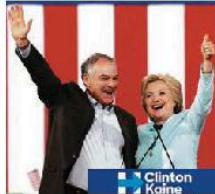

Defining moment and a chance to take on questions that trail her

By Victoria McGrane and Annie Linskey

WASHINGTON — Lock her up! Gully! The prime-time refrain all week at Donald Trump's Republican National Convention in Cleveland had the subtlety of a freight train rumbling along Lake Erie. And for Democrats fretting about the vulnerabilities of their own presidential nominee, it served as a Klaxon warning. These were not just ravings from diehard Clinton haters. They were the over-the-edge manifestation of a real problem Democrats face: The former secretary of state must drive at her own convention, beginning Monday in Philadelphia, to win the trust of middle-of-the-road voters

WASHINGTON — Hillary Clinton's Boeing 737 campaign charter was swapped out for a sleek little private jet. Gone were the hundreds of staff. The motorcade shrank to just a few cars.

It was the summer of 2008, and Clinton — along with her downsized entourage — barnstormed the country for a man they had spent the past year-and-a-half trying to defeat.

Reminders of the demotion from candidate to surrogate surrounded them wherever they went. Barack Obama's signs replaced hers. Women along the rope lines approached her in tears, saying: It should have been you.

As ever, Clinton carried on.

"I was amazed at her ability to dust herself off," recalled Kathleen Strand, one of the handful of staff members who stayed with Clinton through the end of the 2008 general election. "It wasn't so easy for me af-

Vast Millennium Tower is a case study in what urban architecture should aim for

By Robert Campbell

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

The new Millennium Tower at Downtown Crossing is the first arrival in what I hope will turn out to be a new generation of Boston skyscrapers. With construction almost finished and residents beginning to move in, it's clear that the tower offers a lot of lessons about the right way to go about building in the city.

CRITIC'S NOTEBOOK Millennium is big. It fills a whole block of Washington Street and rises 685 feet above the narrow byways of our old city. Viewed from afar, say from across the river in Cambridge, it commands the downtown skyline (for now anyway) like the tallest tree in the forest.

But the triumph of Millennium isn't the long view. It's exactly the opposite. It's the fact that as you walk closer, the tower disappears. Unless you look carefully and crane your neck, you can't find it.

What you're aware of, instead, is an extremely lively stretch of streets and sidewalks. The Millennium Tower lurks like a wizard behind the scenes, pouring a fresh mix Erika Schickel at her home in California. Schickel was asked to leave the Buxton School just weeks before graduation after it was found a teacher had a sexual relationship with her.

A RESPONSE THAT COMPOUNDS THE PAIN

All too often when private school students complain of abuse, they face something harsh and unexpected: retaliation

This story was reported and written by Jenn Abelson, Bella English, Jonathan Saltzman, and Todd Walkowiak of the Globe Spotlight Team.

When a small boarding school in the Berkshires discovered that a music teacher was having a sexual relationship with a female student, administrators responded in a way many parents would applaud: They fired him.

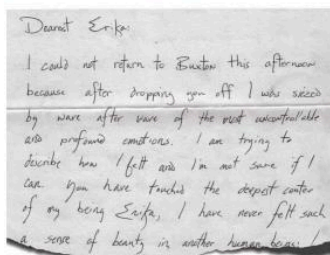

But Buxton School officials took another step as well. They asked the teenager to leave.

Just weeks before graduation in 1982, 18-year-old Erika Schickel was told that her continued presence would make others at the school uncomfortable. That included the teacher's girlfriend, who worked there.

Buxton officials unceremoniously sent Schickel a diploma in the mail and included her picture in the yearbook only at the insistence of indignant friends.

"The top priority for the school was to get rid of me," said Schickel, who remembers boarding the bus
